

the creators project

Art aficionados from around the globe descended onto Miami last week for the city's annual Design Week, hosting art fairs and exhibits featuring both established and upcoming talents. One such fair is SCOPE, which has a rep for hosting some pretty modern, pretty quirky art works. For more than a decade now, the art show organization has become known for showcasing “emerging, contemporary art for a diverse, international crowd” beyond just Miami alone.

Set up right on the sandy beaches, this year's SCOPE Miami Art Fair delivered a wide range of art works that incorporated mixed media infused with technology, ranging from 3D printers to magnetic fields, and even to video art that has a run time to last a couple hundred generations.

After scouring the 90+ booths, we've highlighted 7 artists and their exhibited pieces that managed to land on our radars—and should be on yours too.

Claudio Castillo, Trozo, 2012

A still photo of one of Claudio Castillo's evolving artworks can't do the artist proper justice. While his video artworks can be displayed on a variety of screens, his creations are more than just a video on loop—they're software based, non-linear, random, animated watercolors that have one chance of repetition in 400,000 to 8 trillion years, making each viewing and print unique.